

14 September

The first day in London began with a two and a half hours bus drive to the Greenwich Observatory. Paul and Lydia gave us some information about it.

Next we went to the harbour and did a boat tour on the river Thames. The tour was amazing, we could see most of London's most popular sights and took some great photos of them. The co-captain was the tour guide and gave some information about the city.

After the boat trip, the group split up and 13 people went on a trip at London Eye. A great view over the city and very many picture motives. An attraction you need to visit.

The group which was on the London Eye had a look for the Queen's parade. There were thousands of people. But the only thing you could see were the other people, mobile phones and a green wall. Finally, we came through the crowd of people (and some even managed to catch a glimpse of King Charles).

Meanwhile the other group fought its way to the Hyde Park. That wasn't really easy because nobody looked right and left. In Hyde Park it looked more like a festival than a sad event. There were some big screens with enormous speakers and a lot of Dixi toilets :)

After the ceremony both groups met in Green Park. But that wasn't easy for the London Eye group because of the green walls they had to take a lot detours. In Green Park were most flowers for the queen and thousands of people again.

In the evening we took the metro to come back to our hotel. The problem at the station was that we were there during the rush hour. But the metro was much emptier than we expected.

Before we went to the hotel we ate chicken wings with chips and rice. That was very tasty! Then we went back to the hotel and made a plan for the next day.
