

Day 14

Windsor Castle, London

Today, after having packed our bags yesterday night, we woke up and began preparing ourselves for a long drive towards England's capital city, London. We were very excited. After all, London is one of the biggest cities in Europe! Who wouldn't be excited? We would even be stopping at Windsor Castle, the largest inhabited castle in the world!

We were picked up by a taxi ordered by our host family and drove to the same bus parking lot we had arrived in Torquay in. It's poetic to think that we departed Torquay from the same place we arrived in Torquay in. We were actually the first group to arrive there! We got all our stuff into the bus and the drive began. Adios, Torquay!

On the way to London, we saw something unexpected. By looking out of the windows of the bus, you could see Stonehenge! It was nice to be reminded of the time we spent at the beautiful ancient circle of rocks, but it's crazy to think that it's been nearly 2 weeks since we visited Stonehenge!

Afterwards, we visited Windsor Castle. It was one of the most beautiful castles we've ever been to! There were many things to see, for example a dollhouse that can only be described as more of a "dollmansion". There were also several rooms and hallways which were decorated extremely beautifully, such as the Waterloo Chamber. Sadly, we couldn't take any photos of how said rooms looked. Photography is prohibited inside of most of the castle.

After an hour-long drive from Windsor to King Solomon Hotel, where we were going to stay, we went into our rooms. One of us had to sleep in the same bed as someone else due to there being only one single bed and one double bed in his room and there being three people in his room, which is funny!

This day was, in my opinion, great, even if a large part of it was spent inside of our bus. To the people reading this: We wish you a great day!
